

I firmly believe that the Government does not have the right to easily tap my internet communications. Any administration that attempts to assert such a right will not receive my vote in the upcoming elections.

If the proposed 'backdoor' were to be installed on VoIP networks, they would undoubtedly allow 'tapping' through the internet. It is my opinion that such an infrastructure would make it far too easy for the government to tap my personal communications.

In addition, as someone familiar with internet security, I realize that allowing access via the net leaves open the door that this system could be compromised by criminals, or foreign governments to compromise my communications.

I have a fair right to assume that my personal communications are not being monitored. Please don't take that away.
